On work on the bibliography of D. V. Bubrich

The life and publications of the renowned Finno-Ugric scholar Dmitrij Vladimirovič Bubrich (1890 — 1949) reflect the history of Russian linguistics in the first half of the 20th century. During the periods of the 1917 Revolution, repressions and WW II, he was able to create and lead the studies of Finno-Ugric languages in Soviet Union. While many of his works remain in archives, his published heritage also deserves an attention. The works of Bubrich's disciple G. Kert, devoted to to Bubrich's heritage, include the bibliography of Bubrich's works published in 1975 and reprinted in 1992. The new edition of it (2017 —2019) has about 50 additions, including periodicals and editorial works. The new bibliography contains publications in the field of Slavic, from 1914 to to 2015 (Kert's death).. Another bibliography of Bubrich (DATE) includes about 200 articles by and about Bubrich, as well as reviews of Bubrich's Finno-Ugric studies published in and outside the Soviet Union and biographical articles from 1925 to 2018. The amount of the recent publications about Bubrich's life and his works shows the persistent interest in his heritage. In their totality, Bubrich's Finno-Ugric publications shed light on on the process of 'language building' for Finno-Ugric peoples of the Soviet Union, in particular the Karelian language and its standartization. His works of the last period of his life, apart from linguistic works proper, demonstrate attempts to defend himself and comparative and historical method he adhered to from the pressure of Marrism.
